Discussion

Total Memory

Fig.1 - Average memory allocations among five runs on both first-names.txt and middle-names.txt sources.

The total memory increments each strategy accrued was caused by the calling of the sbrk() function within the implementation, more specifically, was called when a new block was necessary and if a block that existed in the freedMBList wouldn't satisfy the size requirements of the new allocation. As witnessed in figure 1, the best fit strategy resulted in the least amount total memory to be allocated, followed by a small increase in the first fit strategy before the worst fit strategy. The best fit strategy, while only being better than the first strategy by a small amount, is clearly most efficient in searching for a similar sized free block resulting in a much lower total memory usage. The worst fit strategy, as expected, resulted in a largest memory usage due to the inefficiency in the design, allowing new small memory blocks to reuse the largest freed memory blocks available and splitting them to unusable sizes, resulting in new memory blocks being created due to low supply of adequately sized memory blocks in the freed memory blocks list. Although the first fit strategy allows for quicker running time as very little time is spent of searching for an adequately sized memory block as the other strategies, it's inefficiencies in memory management outweighs the slower, but efficient best fit strategy.
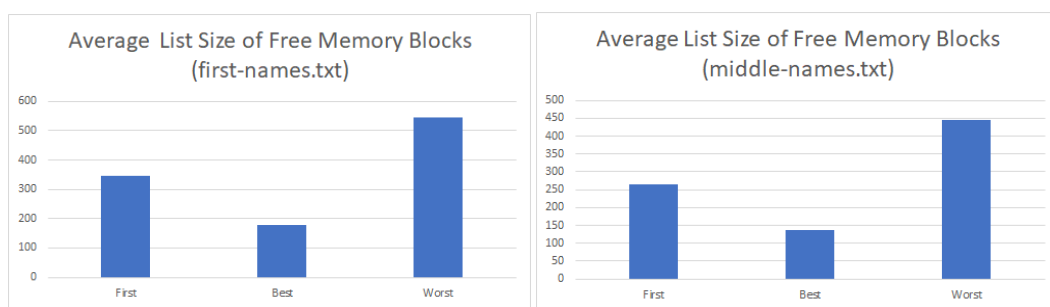

Freed Memory

Fig.2 - Average freed memory blocks available among five runs on both first-names.txt and middle-names.txt sources.

Freed memory block counts share a strong correlation with the total memory usage, as a low count of freed blocks implies a high reuse of memory blocks and as such a low memory usage. The same ratio's between each strategy exists as the total memory usage and only reinforces the benefits of using the best fit strategy.

The act of splitting blocks can be improved, allowing all memory allocation strategies an efficiency boost, through the act of compaction. The consistent result across all memory strategies are memory blocks with unusable sizes in the ranges of 1 and 2 that are not usable for the use case of names, as they range in sizes larger than those small sizes, resulting in a large list of memory blocks that are unusable and it's memory is not returned to the system. Combining such large free blocks would be a significant improvement to the overall program dropping both the amount of elements in the freedMBList and the overall total memory usage of the system.
